Cancer And Your Treatment Options Usually a tumor is either benign or malignant. While it is certainly not a surprise that malignant can survive malignant, it is nonetheless quite important for an individual to realize the different treatment options, as ultimately decisions are dependent on the type of cancer. Knowing one's options can help an individual navigate the health care system more easily. It is absolutely essential that you communicate effectively with your medical and health team about your entire health. Your options are based upon your options. A team of experienced physicians and health care professionals in various specialties must be involved. You should not be trying to "go it alone." You are in good hands, you will get the best care in the right facility, but you should be prepared to hear all of the information and to ask the questions that you want answered. You are going to want to be educated about the strengths and limitations of any possible treatments for your cancer. You need to know your body and know what any treatment is going to do to it. You may be capable of effectively dealing with one form of treatment, but not another. There are essentially two processes for treating cancer. You can cure cancer through surgery, or you can slow it down and destroy it via chemotherapy or radiation. There is no "cure" for cancer in today's medical approach. While getting the facts you need is very important, it's even more important that you tell others about them and about your health. This is a tremendous opportunity for you. You are a catalyst for your health. You are not alone. The pros and cons of both types of treatments can easily be seen. The pro side of chemo is that it can make you healthy again. The pro side of radiation is that it can take away the cancer from the body. You need to know what your options are, how you can effectively deal with them, and why you might be a candidate for a particular treatment. You'll need to have a diet full of fresh vegetables, fruits and proteins. You should also supplement your diet with vitamins and minerals. Choosing a good nutrition plan is crucial for your chances for a successful treatment. You should include a high source of fiber to keep you regular. Also, maintain a healthy weight. Your weight also 570a42141b
