The current location has a file system mapper and a task table. From this data the destination has a file system mapper and a task table. For performance I'm looking to not re-map objects until they move across. So here's my question: How do I create an object in a location and do something to it, from the other location. (ex - create a new task) Do I simply use with new? Or is there something I'm missing? A: There are two different scenarios here: Perform a new Task and write it to the database. Create a Task from the database and write it to the database. You should go for the second one. Think of what happens when you perform a new Task: A new entry is created in the TaskTable and a new row is added in the FileSystemMapper. The new Task is then sent to the database using something like DataSet or LINQ to SQL. Note that if you use a DataSet, for each one of the objects added into it, a row is added into the FileSystemMapper. For that reason, I'd recommend to create a new object in the original location, and then create the object in the destination and attach it to the original object. Something like this (assume that Location1 has a FileSystemMapper called FileSystemMapper1 and a TaskTable called TaskTable1, and Location2 has a FileSystemMapper called FileSystemMapper2 and a TaskTable called TaskTable2):

var originalObject = new Object1(); // do some stuff with originalObject FileSystemMapper1.Add(originalObject); // do some other stuff with originalObject var destinationObject = new Object2
