Yep, I'll say it. This is the game! I find it insane. It shouldn't work. It's a game built around the player idea of a dragon. And it's running backwards. And the dragon is a bloated bullshit game design.) The game is built in the Game Maker format. The audio is built with a combination of the open source project Open Broadcaster Software and Adobe Audition. This involves a lot of delay and time wasting technical reverse engineering. 3:33 Nintendun Vol. 1: The Master Race Dragon Dr. No Nintendun Vol. 1: The Master Race Dragon Dr. No Nintendun Vol. 1: The Master Race Dragon Dr. No! This is a game made by a student for the Ludum Dare #33, a Ludum Dare-style competition where people make games in a weekend. I hope you'll enjoy playing it.Tuberculosis of the spinal column--mechanical behaviour and complications. The mechanical behaviour of a model of spinal tuberculosis, including the bony lesion and the individual organs of the immune system, was studied using a multistructure finite element model (MFSEM). A transverse process fracture was simulated and the initial loading was applied to the centre of the spinal canal. The displacement and deformation of the bone were followed during the development of the lesion and the behaviour of the individual organs of the immune system was determined. The preliminary results suggest that the bone fractures before the other organ structures and the bone lesion develops before any symptoms of the disease appear. The earlier fracture is completed, the higher the pressure in the vertebral canal becomes, which will induce the most symptoms. The tissues of the vertebral canal show, at the first moment, the beginning of their destruction, while the disc is the only structure, which is the only to recover after the development of the disease. The MFSEM is also being used

What's new in Anatidae:

 can employ many non-visual atypical methods (e.g., Microcaecilia, \[\[@B71]\]; Pectoralia, \[\[@B19]\]; Acanthis, \[\[@B20]\]; and Cryptotympana, \[\[@B20]\]). However, species-specific asymmetry in the position of the putative eyes, and the lack of eyes within the posterior head of Lithobates gibertii and Lithobates utahensis, further indicate the extrapolation of quormous species' cephalic region. It is also noteworthy that Lithobates gibertii lacks a tympanum, in contrast to other members of the Nyctibatrachidae, whose tympanal surfaces are hidden beneath the eye \[\[@B72],[\@B73]\]. Nevertheless, the evolutionary path followed by the Diadectidae, including Gastrophryne, can be regarded as a useful case for studying the evolution of eye placement in Caudata. Despite its splenicity, the anatomy of its cephalic region indicates that it follows the "trioid/Deltophryine" pattern. However, the presence of eyes at the anterior pole and possible tympanal structures at the posterior pole indicate that, given the overall cephalic design, bilateral vision might have occurred during the evolution of Gastrophryne. Other neobatrachians, such as the Limnonectinae, display a "tropically-circumplectic" cephalic form, a typical arrangement of the ocular placoid in Limnonectines \[\[@B70]\]. This arrangement also hints at the fact that the eyes of these forms might have seen only on one side. The small species Phryne opaca exhibits a mesocircum-topical pattern. This asymmetry might have evolved relatively fast given the well-developed tympanum and also the small eyes, which are located anteriorly by being in a highly-transparent area of the head \[\[@B71]\]. This result contrasts with that of Deltophryne species, that exhibit a quormous topography in their cephalic regions and a mandible with several robust broad teeth, while having an asymmetric
