Analysis of experimental data from the ITER pellet injection experiments indicates that electromagnetic noise can be effectively removed from specific EPR integral measurements. These measurements are used to infer plasma density fluctuations. We consider four noise sources in experiments on ITER operation and design a data analysis technique that eliminates their impact on the inferred fluctuations. The technique hinges on the identification of correlated fluctuation signals in specific measurements that include the poloidal magnetic field and toroidal current. Measurement time series are then split into nonoverlapping segments based on these correlated signals. The resulting maps of the plasma density fluctuation amplitudes are insensitive to the contributions from these sources.

Large prion diseases in laboratory mice and non-human primates: PrP genotype and infectious titre. The identification of diverse prion strains among different mammalian species has suggested potential relationships between inter-strain variation of the disease, the primary structure of the prion protein (PrP) and the secondary structure of the infecting PrP(Sc) molecule. We have used a series of strain-specific PrP mutants to confirm the sensitivity of mouse scrapie to a single amino acid change within a human PrP sequence. This approach
