A: It doesn't seem to be a general security issue, but rather a feature of the latest Webstorm version. I believe it may have something to do with the way Webstorm handles Unicode characters when it uses a web server (Webstorm itself is written in Java) to talk to the server. Something that has changed in this latest release. What I noticed was, if I set the URL encoding to "UTF-8" when I was testing it seemed to work. But if I tried it on a regular site and used something like "UTF-8" I kept getting the same error message. As far as I can tell, it has to do with the encoding in the headers sent to the server. I verified this because I had a similar problem with the editor in which I was writing and when I changed the encoding to "UTF-8" I no longer got the error. I do not have a fix for this at the moment, but hopefully some other people have an answer for you.
