Microdialysis is a technique for measuring changes in local concentrations of bioactive compounds at the probe tip. It has been successfully applied to the study of peripheral hypothalamic-pituitary systems. The aim of the present study was to evaluate the applicability of microdialysis for the detection of changes in corticosterone (CORT) levels in the pituitary interstitium. Uptake of [3H] CORT, intra-interstitium [3H] CORT and plasma [3H] CORT was studied in two transplantable ACTH-secreting tumors, the CVP-12 tumor and the H-81 tumor. In the CVP-12 tumor, a 99% decrease in interstitium [3H] CORT was observed on 1 h of perfusion. In the H-81 tumor, a 90% decrease in interstitium [3H] CORT was observed, but there was no change in the plasma [3H] CORT. These data demonstrate the feasibility of the microdialysis technique for studying changes in CORT at the site of its secretion, and that the technique is valuable for the study of the peripheral hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis.
