Cystinase-sensitive, heat-labile adhesion proteins have been previously demonstrated on the surface of Chlamydia trachomatis (ovis) serovar E, and the presence of these proteins is associated with increased cyst (ovoid) stability. In the present study, the presence of cystinase-sensitive, heat-labile adhesion proteins on the surface of Chlamydia trachomatis serovar L2 (chlamydiae) has been demonstrated. The heat stability of C. trachomatis ovis E and C. trachomatis L2 chlamydiae was compared. The chlamydial adhesion protein (CADP) on the surface of C. trachomatis L2 chlamydiae was stable to treatment with cystinase at 100 degrees C for 10 min, whereas C. trachomatis ovis E chlamydiae adhesion proteins were sensitive to cystinase. Further examination using an adhesion assay demonstrated increased adhesion of C. trachomatis L2 chlamydiae compared to C. trachomatis ovis E chlamydiae in the presence of cystinase. These results suggest that the protein that is cystinase sensitive has a role in chlamydial adhesion. This protein, CADP, has been demonstrated to be a heat-labile adhesion protein. Identification of a chlamydial adhesion protein may provide new targets for anti-chlamydial therapies that are based on both the sensitivity of this protein to cystinase and on its heat-labile nature.Q:
