Unless otherwise stated in the post, this is my original work.Q: Error while reading in a file with thousands of columns I need to read a tsv file in C++ where each row is a "requirement_id, item_id, description, requirements_count" (a requirement is an html file saved as a text). The problem is that I need to read the file in batches to prevent "Out of Memory" errors. the problem is that I can't use a vector or a list in c++, and my current solution is to allocate memory for each column, and then read until the end of the current requirement_id. the code: ofstream outFile; outFile.open("out.txt"); while (inputFile.is_open()) { getline (inputFile, line); // Get the number of requirements from line int index; get (index); // Read each requirement_id from line, then load the file and store in the memory map int requirement_id; get (requirement_id); memory_map.store (requirement_id, inputFile); // Read the columns in this requirement int item_id; get (item_id); get (description); get (requirements_count); std::vector::iterator requirement; for (requirement = requirements.begin(); requirement size () size ()

Compression means that you need to be careful when storing data to ensure that you can retrieve it again. It also needs to be very quick, since it is generally used while executing. Some common compression methods used include: Compression: Character-based Lossy Lossless Huffman ZLIB gzip lzip PPMd PPMdH Entropy LZH The PPM methods of lossless compression rely on the entropy of the source data. This means that they are more suited to compression where the data is made up of a lot of the same sequence of bits, such as data from audio or video files. The Huffman compression methods are more suitable to compressing data where some elements take up a lot of space, such as text and HTML files. Entropy comes from a process that is ongoing and random. When used in compression, it means that the data has little redundancy and a high degree of similarity. Compression can also be classified as either lossy or lossless based on how it affects the source data. Lossy Lossy means that the data is reduced in quality. The data is reduced, but it is not completely destroyed. The most common example of this would be JPEG files. If you use the right settings and quality, you can get a reasonable result out of a JPEG file. Lossless Lossless compression can be characterised as being completely lossless. There is a high degree of similarity between the original and the compressed data. b7e8fdf5c8
