Venezuelan artist Yosimar Reyes recently created a shadow puppet show called Tarrare (“The Choking”), which performs in the streets of San Francisco and around the world. The performance, which premiered at the Invisible Dog in San Francisco, is based on the stories of everyday people, particularly migrants and children. Reyes uses shadow puppets to tell his stories. He lives and works in Venezuela. “Due to the ongoing political crisis, [Venezuela] has been filled with the feeling of fear,” said Reyes. “I would never have imagined that the story of one man’s desperation could become a way to communicate with audiences in a whole other part of the world.” Reyes is a husband and father of two children, and he moved to the United States in 2015 to find a better life. He is a self-taught artist, and he didn’t intend to teach himself how to make shadow puppets. Instead, he found his way to his current artistic media after working on a street performance project with the Invisible Dog. There, he learned how to move the puppets across the stage using a stopwatch. “This is something I began to enjoy, and I began to think about what it would be like to make a show based on my own experiences,” said Reyes. “I began to work more with the puppets, and I began to create my own stories.” Reyes’s story focuses on one man’s desperation, but his performance includes stories of the consequences of undocumented migration, deportation, and the threat of political violence. “I do believe that the figures who are the real protagonists of my stories are invisible people,” said Reyes. “I would like to make people think about what their role is in the world, and the impact that the world has on them.” One of the characters in Reyes’s performance is a father and a migrant with a family in the United States. The character represents more than himself. He also shows how immigration policy affects families, and he explores the symbolism and implications of the stories people are encouraged to keep to themselves. “The character is an example of those who are forced to live in fear and uncertainty,” said Reyes. “He is someone who lives and dreams, who has work, and he even gets along with his wife and kids

The NFL will protest the reinstatement of San Francisco 49ers quarterback Colin Kaepernick to the league’s football activities. The league decided that no player would be allowed to protest the national anthem as part of his protest against police brutality and discrimination of people of color. In response, the league sent a memo to the teams informing them that no player would be allowed to demonstrate the national anthem during the games on September 2, in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. The NFL decided to send the memo to the teams in response to Colin Kaepernick's decision to take a knee during the national anthem. Kaepernick made his famous political statement on the heels of a number of high profile shootings of black people by police, and the rise of the "Black Lives Matter" movement./* *
