Free NintendoÁ .Computers can be connected to a network in a number of different ways to allow users to access network content. For example, LANs (local area networks), WANs (wide area networks) and the Internet can be accessed directly using an Ethernet connection, or via a router, modem or other device that can establish a physical or logical connection between LANs. Other known connections can include dial-up and virtual private network (VPN) connections to remote networks, satellite connections to international networks, and optical connections to global networks. Several types of network connections are standardized. Ethernet is a local area network standard that allows computers to communicate with each other in a building or campus. As is well known, Ethernet consists of network cables or twisted pair of wires that are connected between a hub or switch and the individual computers. The Internet is a worldwide inter-network of interconnected networks that can be used to deliver information in the form of digital messages. The Internet consists of many smaller private networks known as autonomous systems (ASs). Two or more autonomous systems can be connected together by a larger network such as the Internet. The Internet is often used to connect a user's home computer to the Internet, which allows the user to access Internet sites from his or her home computer. The Internet is often used to deliver voice and video information between computers. The World Wide Web (WWW) is the Internet's multimedia information
