Sensitivity and specificity of purified gp70 from the spirochete Treponema pallidum to antiserum. The performance of a specific serum test for syphilis based on the immunoblotting of the antibody response to a Treponema pallidum vaccine has remained relatively low over the last decade. It has been possible to attribute this poor performance to the sensitivity of the test antigen. In the present study, the sensitivity and specificity of purified gp70, the major protective antigen in T. pallidum, and the main antigen to which the antibody response of man immunized with a killed virulent strain of T. pallidum has been characterized by immunoblotting, was examined. The data indicate that the sensitivity of the test is retained when gp70 is detected by the use of human convalescent antisera and an immunoblotting technique.
