Conventionally, as a known technique for a vehicle door mirror provided in a vehicle to provide a visibility of a driver or the like for a driver of the vehicle, there is a known technique as described in Japanese Patent Publication No. 6-102026. In this patent document, an interior mirror case is provided that is equipped with two mirror glass plates; and in this case, in order to avoid damage of the interior mirror case from a collision of an occupant or the like, the interior mirror case is split into two. The interior mirror case is provided with an outer peripheral frame, an inner peripheral frame, and a connecting frame. When the collision occurs, the interior mirror case is split into two at the connecting frame, and the fractured parts of the interior mirror case then move in opposite directions from each other and fasten to each other in an overlapping manner, thereby preventing the collapse of the interior mirror case in two directions. However, there is a problem in that, even if the exterior mirror case is split into two in a collision of the vehicle, the interior mirror case is not split into two in the collision, and thus, the collapse of the interior mirror case in two directions cannot be avoided. Further, there is another problem in that, in order to avoid the collapse of the interior mirror case in two directions, the exterior mirror case is split into two at the connecting frame and the shattered parts of the exterior mirror case then move in opposite directions from each other and fasten to each other in an overlapping manner, and thus, the connecting frame is hard to be processed.
