When I was planning the geocache for my Birthday, I searched the map to see if there would be any caches in that area so I could try it. It was there! I called my wife and we headed to the cache and it was exactly as it was in the map! It was a great way to start the birthday. The GPS coordinates are in the body of this post, but the full cache coordinates are on the map. My first attempt to learn Javascript was to write a script to calculate the coordinates from the cache name and number to a search page to determine if it was found. It failed and probably broke a lot of people's browsers... After learning more Javascript, I was able to write one to calculate the coordinates of the address to search Google for. This worked great, until my wife told me to make sure I was searching for the same address with the same name we had found. The namenumeric-coordinates of the cache was not being matched, so they failed the if statement and eventually the coordinates for the address were calculated for the wrong location. Suffice to say, I'm a bit of a resourceful person when it comes to finding out how to do something, but I still need help.... I tried to figure out what the ultimate coordinates were. In order for this to have been easy, I used something called a coordinate reference system (CRS). What is a CRS? Basically, it is a way to convert from a coordinate to some other coordinate. The way that most GPS units will work is that it will tell you what longitude and latitude you are at and convert it to a different coordinate system. The CRS used by most Google Maps is called a Web Mercator. (check out this page for more info:
