The new features are meant to make using iOS on your iPhone, iPad, or iPod touch faster and easier than before. However, iOS 8 also brings a new way for the government to access the iPhone, and the changes that Apple has made in iOS 8 have left privacy advocates and human rights organizations asking serious questions about the integrity of the iPhone. As a software developer, I still love Apple and I still love my iPhone, but the changes that Apple has made in iOS 8 have left me worried about the company's commitment to privacy. I don't think I'm alone in being worried about privacy on the iPhone. Several other developers and privacy advocates have written about their concerns with iOS 8. The Electronic Frontier Foundation has written an excellent in-depth look at the new security features that Apple has made to iOS 8, describing how they can be used by the government to access a user's phone and browse all of their private files. The other day, a report came out from the Washington Post about a group of activists that were able to unlock the iPhone used by a top military contractor by exploiting a flaw in iOS 8. The activists have since demanded that Apple grant them access to the data on the iPhone, but Apple has refused to do so. If the activists can gain access to the data on the iPhone, it's not clear what they'll be able to do with it. And if they do find a way to break into the phone, the American Civil Liberties Union has made it clear that they'll be using that access to demand the release of a second journalist's phone, which was initially taken by the FBI. And this is not the only change that has taken place since iOS 8 was announced. Apple's biggest security update since iOS 8 was iOS 8.1. iOS 8.1, just released yesterday, includes a new feature 6d1f23a050
