The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for recognizing faults in an electric utility network in a manner that ensures low fault-reject rate. The great number of electronic devices and appliances which are connected to the public electric utility (PU) system via automatic meters for measuring electricity consumption can result in significant problems for the system. Among these problems are network faults which may occur in any of several locations on the system. Although these faults can be identified by a human operator before they reach an electrical appliance or device (i.e., that they are pre-current faults) network fault identification currently relies on communication with the affected devices. When an appliance or device is affected by a fault
