The human genome was studied at different levels of resolution for a complex, polymorphic, long heterochromatic region, the MHC loci. Heterochromatic regions can be classified into two types, GC-rich and AT-rich. The detailed karyotypic evolution of this locus was studied in 15 diverse human populations (T, N, K, and Amerindians) with banding and FISH methods. The results indicate that the MHC locus is not only polymorphic and evolves rapidly in the human population, but also that it shows distinct karyotypic evolution in the human genome depending on the type of heterochromatin. The GC-rich type evolves mainly by deletion and the AT-rich type by gain of material from another chromosomal region. These results support the theory that the polymorphism of a heterochromatic segment of the genome is the result of a process of natural selection for variation at the heterochromatic segment.Jaffe's Law of Equi-Lateral Directional Intertarsal Deformities.
