The current study examines for the first time the phylogenetic relationships within the Apidae tribe, which makes the first step in reconstructing the evolutionary history of the bee family. Our systematic phylogeny of 26 apoid wasp species and their close relatives indicate that nearly all extant sister groups of bees are polyphyletic and should be divided into multiple families. The mitochondrial gene cox1 shows evidence for a close phylogenetic affinity of the honey bee genus Apis with the Bumblebee tribe, although the relationship remains uncertain due to long-branch attraction. Nuclear genes indicate a very close phylogenetic relationship of the European Honeybee Apis mellifera with the rest of the bee family. Species of Apis are not native to South Africa and have only established in the area around Cape Town for about 100 years [8]. Our DNA barcode data and other evidence show that they are distinct from Apis in the Nearctic region, but also from members of the different extant bee tribes. The closest neighbour of Apis is the South African Bumblebee Bombus australis, and the two taxa share on average a recent split. Using phylogenetic analysis of co-distributed species of ants and bees in South Africa, we suggest that the arrival of Apis occurred by an active human-assisted dispersal event [11]. We further propose that Apis and the honey bees in South Africa originated in a different region from those in the Nearctic and Palearctic. Based on our findings, we hope that future studies will benefit from a phylogeny of the Apidae family as they might contribute to the conservation of African bees, the conservation of floral diversity, as well as to ecological and evolutionary studies.
