if you're primarily using a webcam for streaming content, there are two main things to look out for - buffering and latency. buffering is the delay you will experience between when you press the record button on your webcam and when the video actually starts streaming. this is why we recommend using a usb 2.0 connection rather than a usb 3.0 connection for streaming. you'll get a much smoother and more responsive stream with a usb 2.0 connection and a much shorter delay with usb 3.0. if your webcam is old or doesn't have a clear lens, it may have a 'bokeh' effect. this is a fuzzy border around the subject that is blurred out but can still be visible when the subject is moving. the more blurred the border, the better the camera will perform with motion. the best webcams for video calls are usually the ones that offer a stable, reliable design with adjustable image distortion, to avoid videos being overly distorted. the most common distortion issue is 'pincushion' which is when the edges of the image are over-distorted making them look like they've been 'pinched' from top and bottom. another common issue is 'keystoning' or 'keystone' distortion which makes the top of the image look tilted compared to the bottom. another thing to look for is a webcam's auto-white balance feature, which allows the webcam to automatically adjust its white balance in natural environments, so you don't have to manually adjust it. this is especially useful if you're using the webcam for video calls. there are also a few webcams on our list that have a built-in microphone for things like skype calls. this can be a useful feature, especially for those who are just starting out with video calls.

the choice to not include a microphone or autofocus capabilities will make it seem like a half-baked product for anyone just looking for a webcam, but the inclusion of those features often proves to be more trouble than they're worth for folk broadcasting on sites like twitch or youtube. as a result, the facecam is beautifully optimized for the streaming community, with some of the best software we've ever seen on a webcam to boot. as 2022 starts to wane, a great webcam is more important than ever. when the coronavirus pandemic hit in 2020, everyone scrambled to buy a webcam for zoom calls and remote learning, and few of us thought we'd be doing it for long. but now more than ever, working from home is here to stay and honestly it's probably time we all upgraded from the cheap, grainy 720p webcams we picked up in a hurry back in march 2020. fortunately, a bunch of great webcams have been released this year, so there's never been a better time to buy. before buying a webcam, it is necessary to check if it is compatible with your computer. usually, you can find the compatibility list of your webcam. also, it is possible to check whether the webcam is compatible with the operating system you use. after this, the purchase is a very simple process. usually, you can buy a webcam on any online store. however, some webcam retailers offer exclusive discounts and sometimes you can also get free shipping and a warranty. as 2022 starts to wane, a great webcam is more important than ever. when the coronavirus pandemic hit in 2020, everyone scrambled to buy a webcam for zoom calls and remote learning, and few of us thought we'd be doing it for long.
