after the academy's vote, the capitalization of titles of books, magazines, etc., began to drop out of fashion, and within a few years, almost all publications were using only lower-case words. some people still felt that capitals were unnecessary, but they were the minority. the practice of changing words into lower-case letters continued for many years, and the capitalization issue has remained a closely-guarded secret of american writing for the last 65 years. to date, no books or journal titles have appeared with any capital letters. it is very interesting that the american academy of arts and letters did not make this change until it became controversial. in fact, the academy has never published any books, magazines, or newspapers in which the title or any of the words are capitalized. many people speculate that the academy was concerned about the effect this change would have on the distribution of its name. after all, its name appears in all caps in most dictionaries, the last of which was printed in 1967. by changing the academy's name, the organization would have to change its title. there are some exceptions that can blur the pattern of changes. still, changes in punctuation, capitalization, and orthography are the most obvious. occasionally, there will be variant spellings of orthographic elements. there will also be general spelling preferences used by only certain groups. for example, there are references to "for," "to," "with," and "of" in the 1771 edition of Joseph and also in the 1831 revision. It is not widely known that some of these spellings for these elements were formerly in common use; however, they were eventually relegated to historical importance. "I can not say what kind of criticism there is to be made of the French language, if I may speak of it in English, I declare that there is not; I think it's a language in like manner." -j. sterb, the grammar of conversation 5ec8ef588b
