Heart failure is defined as a clinical syndrome resulting from the inability of the heart to generate an adequate cardiac output. It is the most common condition that results in hospitalization for patients over 65 years old. The detection of myocardial damage due to ischemia or injury is of paramount importance in the early detection of heart failure. To evaluate myocardial function in patients with heart failure. Forty patients aged between 25 and 75, were enrolled in this study. Ten women and ten men were studied with a mean age of 64.3+/-15.7 years. Left ventricular systolic and diastolic functions were evaluated by M-mode, pulse wave and tissue Doppler echocardiography. Twenty healthy controls of the same age and sex were also studied. The mitral valve inflow patterns were assessed by pulsed wave Doppler. Mitral flow patterns were classified according to E/A ratio and E/E' ratio. Mitral inflow pattern was studied in the diastolic phase by using pulsed wave Doppler. In patients with heart failure, mitral E/A, E/E' and the mitral flow E were significantly lower than in control subjects (P<0.05). The mitral flow deceleration
