Biocompatibility studies of the preparation process of a biodegradable microsphere based on poly(ϵ -caprolactone) for ocular delivery. The present study aimed to investigate in vitro biocompatibility of poly(ϵ -caprolactone) (PCL) microspheres. Hydroxyethyl starch was incorporated into PCL microspheres to obtain thermosensitive microspheres. They were then investigated for in vitro biocompatibility using an inflammatory cell line (RAW 264.7) and an epithelial cell line (HeLa). They were characterized in terms of morphology, particle size, and release rate. The release rate of prepared microspheres was achieved up to 70% of total amount of microspheres. No cytotoxicity was shown after 72 h incubation with RAW 264.7 and HeLa cells. They were observed to be spherical and had diameters around 100 μm . These results suggested that prepared microspheres were biocompatible, and thus the fabricated microspheres could be used for long-term drug delivery.

1. Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to the field of wireless communication systems. More particularly, the invention relates to a wireless communication device with an integrated security architecture.

2. Description of the Related Art Wireless communication systems, such as the Global System for Mobile communications (GSM) are known to support wireless communications between a plurality of mobile subscriber units (MSU) via a network infrastructure. The MSU includes mobile units such as mobile telephones, personal data assistants (PDAs) and the like. The public land mobile network (PLMN) is a geographic area served by a network operator. A mobile subscriber unit in a GSM network is required to register at a base station and to have its identity authenticated before it is authorized to access the network. The base station has a Home Location Register (HLR) or similar database. The HLR stores the IMSI (International Mobile Subscriber Identity) and the V
