Determining the kinetics of multiple isothermal reactions from an in situ reactor during a transition between two steady states. In an integrated kinetic model it is assumed that the time-course of the reactor system in which a set of chemical reactions occur is well approximated by a deterministic transition between two unique steady states. Experimental results are presented which demonstrate that this assumption is reasonable for a set of reactions that are catalyzed by enzyme of a microbial community growing on a semi-solid substrate. Model predictions suggest that, in such systems, the kinetics of the transition from one steady state to the next is not controlled by the rate of production of individual chemicals, but rather by the length of time the system spends in the steady state in which it has undergone the transition. A simple procedure is presented which enables experimental systems to be judged with respect to this criterion. This invention relates generally to balustrades for the floor of a building, and more particularly to a balustrade assembly including railing units having brackets for attachment to the underlying support structure, and which has a visual finish that resembles the railing units. Balustrades are commonly used in the industry to protect and enhance the overall aesthetics of the floor of a building. Conventional balustrades are generally of two types: one is a continuous balustrade, which covers the full height of the floor; the other is an in-laid balustrade, which is installed over the existing floor and rests on an underlying support structure. The continuous balustrade
