Adobe has always tried to make Photoshop easier to learn, and one of the ways to do it was by making large groups of actions available in a single menu. Now I can tell you how to crop, resize, flip, and color correct in a single dialog. For example, there is one dialog for cropping corners, and one for cropping the entire image. You can resize an image by moving sliders that are directly related to the image size. You can also adjust exposure and contrast in the same dialog, where you move sliders to modify how the image is toned. Adobe Photoshop flows neatly into Creative Cloud, greatly simplifying the process of getting and sharing images with your clients. For example, by default, the frequency of updates for your Lightroom catalog is one per week. Broaden the purview of that update frequency by going to the Preferences dialog. Instead of every 5 minutes, refresh your catalog hourly, daily, or weekly. That's a very simple and transparent way for you to tell the Software what you want it to do. You can also get more granular for your updates by adjusting the range between requests for updates. For example, instead of every 5 minutes, you can get a specific update once in 16 minutes. If one of the updates takes longer than usual, you'll notice it and can roll back the update if you don't like the change. Image-editing software seems to always have issues with Adobe signature files (apparently using XML), which is just a dishonest way of getting around the EULA. In Photoshop, this happens just about every time you open a PSD file.
