Internet An internet or World Wide Web is a network of computers and servers that communicate with each other using the Internet protocol suite. The protocol suite consists of a set of protocols, in particular Transmission Control Protocol (TCP) and Internet Protocol (IP), which allow users to remotely access network services, such as e-mail, and transfer files across the network. Other network services, such as Domain Name System (DNS) and Network Time Protocol (NTP), are used to locate and synchronize clocks across the network. The term Internet often has a narrower meaning, referring to the collection of network top-level domains (TLDs) and the hierarchical scope of the IP address space that supports them. The Internet is sometimes called the global network.
