Not too cold; hot enough.” Taele is a Dutch tour operator who, among other activities, has seen it all. “As the civil war was going on and the action was happening, it was quite a risk to book hotels,” he explains. “We had to book them six months in advance, but when you want the best, you know where to find it.” A member of Jordan’s traditional tourism board of “tourist ambassadors”, he has been appointed to inspect tour groups and train tour operators to ensure they are “up to the highest standards.” His current responsibilities include helping operators to adapt to the risks currently posed by local authorities under Turkish pressure. “In the past, we were told we could only operate in certain areas,” says Taele. “We have to apply to rent hotels and other areas outside of known terrorist areas, and we have to be sure they will be safe. We even have to go to certain hotels, check for cleanliness, and make sure they meet our standards.” It’s a new state of affairs for a country like Jordan, where tourism is widely regarded as vital for the country’s image, prosperity and international position. “Tourism is very important for Jordan,” says Taele. “Nearly 10 million people come to Jordan every year to visit its deserts and modern cities and this is the source of employment. “Jordan will benefit from such tourism very much. It will improve its economy and also our tourism industry will benefit as well.” Amman, Jordan's capital

Taele was born in northern Holland and spent most of his youth there. He lived in Beirut, where his father, an engineer, worked, before leaving for Jordan, by which time the mother of his five children had died. Taele's
