The immunologic characteristics of human beta-globulin (H-BG) were investigated prospectively in 22 infants. H-BG was measured in serum, and the safety and usefulness of H-BG in preventing infant respiratory illness were tested in preterm and full-term infants. H-BG levels were lower and IgG levels were higher in preterm infants than in full-term infants. H-BG levels and IgG levels decreased with age in both preterm and full-term infants. The H-BG levels of preterm infants with respiratory illness decreased significantly during the illness, but not in full-term infants. The respiratory illness in preterm infants was mainly due to viral infections. These findings indicate that the immunologic characteristics of H-BG in preterm infants are different from those in full-term infants. Attenuation of acoustic startle response by chronic treatment of central dopamine D2-like receptor. Chronic treatment with D2-like dopamine receptor agonists attenuates the acoustic startle response (ASR), suggesting that D2-like dopamine receptor is involved in the regulation of the ASR. In order to address the characteristics of the receptor subtype underlying these actions, the present study employed ex vivo microdialysis technique to determine extracellular levels of dopamine (DA) and 3,4-dihydroxyphenylacetic acid (DOPAC), the primary DA metabolite, in the mesencephalic-diencephalic complex of guinea pig brain. Microdialysis following chronic treatment with a selective D1 agonist, SK&F 38393 (10 microM/ml per 2 ml), or a selective D2 agonist, quinpirole (1 microM/ml per 2 ml), revealed increased extracellular levels of DA and DOPAC, respectively. These results suggest that extracellular levels of DA and DOPAC can be independently examined by this technique. Furthermore, chronic treatment of dopamine D2-
