I've been working professionally with the Creative Suite back in the day. Then I moved on to working with the Lumen 5.2 beta. I was impressed with what I saw in that beta, so I was excited to see the version 5.2. The interface is reminiscent of the UI of Photoshop Elements, that's for sure. Overall, I really liked the new interface. It took a bit of getting used to, but you'll certainly feel more at home in Lightroom 5.2. The new interface is an improvement. It's not a revolution. I admit that I find the tabs to be a little annoying, and that sorting is a little confusing. Often, you have to resort to an extra submenu and then back out to the previous submenu to make the change. However, as a whole, the new interface is very intuitive. Much better, in fact. I found myself spending far less time looking for and finding the tools I needed to accomplish my tasks. Lightroom 5.2 has relatively few changes. That's no surprise since it's in beta. That's for sure, there are a lot of new features and changes but it is still in its beta stage. As the interface is now, I think it's better for us to wait until the final release. I was impressed with the workflow enhancements. Some of these are expected, another are not. The ability to link to a favorite place is more intuitive. You can now link to multiple folders. There is a new Dim Clarity option for increased sharpness. You can now change the color balance through curves and have a much more powerful one-click exposure via the fixed settings in the middle dark room. There is a new selective color removal option, which is very helpful. One point that I will note is that the selective color removal is not, in my experience at least, the quick way to remove color. With that in mind, I must admit that I have not used Lightroom by itself for a long time. I haven't updated my Creative Suite or any of my tools since Lightroom 2 and that would explain why I never tried Selective color removal. I have to say that I am impressed with the features and that it's a workflow enhancement that add to the ease of use and make the process of editing faster if done correctly. So I think the pros have also noticed the improvement too.
