Cannabidiol is a major active component of Cannabis sativa and is known for its therapeutic use in some medical conditions. This study evaluated the in vivo and in vitro analgesic profile of cannabidiol on the basis of their effects on the experimental model of GABA-mediated modulation of pain by gabapentin. The antinociceptive effect of cannabidiol was tested in vivo in two models, namely, hot-plate and formalin tests and in vitro in primary dissociated spinal sensory neurons. The motor impairment was assessed using rotarod assay. Cannabidiol (50, 75, and 100 mg/kg) and gabapentin (80 mg/kg) were orally administered, and their analgesic potential was assessed using hot-plate and formalin test models, respectively, with or without muscimol (1 µg/site) microinjected intraplantarly at 1, 5, and 15 min before the administration of the drug. Cannabidiol failed to induce any significant effect in the rotarod test, while gabapentin decreased the latency to falling in the rotarod test. In the hot-plate test, only gabapentin decreased the latency to pain-induced responses. In the formalin test, both gabapentin and cannabidiol delayed the paw pain-related behaviors, and their effects were time dependent. The analgesic effect of gabapentin (75 mg/kg) was significantly reduced in the presence of microinjected muscimol in both models, while 04aeff104c
