The invention relates to a method for the thermal processing of a porous, crystalline substrate with the aid of hot gases, preferably air or inert gases, whereby the heat supplied is generated by the contact of the hot gases with the substrate surface. From the state of the art, several methods for the thermal processing of such substrates are known in which the heat supplied to the substrate is generated by the contact of hot gases with the substrate surface. In particular, the known methods are based on the idea of heating the substrate with hot gases to a temperature at which a reduction of the size of the holes and pores occurs or at which a rec 04aeff104c
