Some of the first pictures I remember seeing of my mom and her dad are of them pushing the carriage behind them when they'd go to pick my brother and me up from daycare. I know the names of most of my family members, of people that have lived there. But I'm still unprepared for anything that happens to pass through my tiny, unfurnished, glass home. All I can really think of is how swiftly the years have gone by, how many new generations now live in these houses, and how many toys I have already had. I can't even imagine what it would be like to be the first in the family to carry on the traditions my parents have. If I was responsible for the legacy of my family's life's work, and my will, what would I do? Would I build even more? Would I spend my days smiling my signature smile that's always been my trademark, or am I the type that has to travel around in a massive buggy? Would I want to keep fighting off all the battles the last Indiana family before me was faced with? Some say it's important to make your family's legacy known. These are questions that I ask myself every day, and I am not alone. One of my most favorite past times is reading About the Author, the official story of the Indiana family that many of us know, love, and are proud of. It's a story about the good, the bad, and everything in between. Of finding love, escaping war
