Lightroom is a very professional—and even a little old-fashioned—software. I won't lie to you, I also found it a bit difficult to understand and use at first. Once you get used to it, however, it drives you towards your goals, which can be achieved rather easily by spending less time fiddling around with unnecessary options. And lest you assume that Lightroom only handles images, you might be surprised to find out that it also works with PowerPoint presentations, which are not very different from images. Now, you can still also organize images, edit formats, remove unwanted objects, and do a lot of other stuff within PowerPoint creation tools like the Page Layout. In addition to these tasks, you can create a number of “clips”, which is how you can annotate and time-tag your documents. Naturally, you need to be wary of the “clip” functionality in PowerPoint before moving forward with sharing to the web, files or to other programs. What is making Lightroom so popular is the absolutely brilliant tools in Photoshop. Yes, I am an old-school guy, and I also love you to bits Adobe. Lightroom tends to be a bit slower for some things than Photoshop, but it is the most powerful program in its class and the best when it comes to editing raw images. That's not all you can do with Lightroom, either. You can easily sync files to mobile devices, share images and edits with other applications, tag friends and work colleagues, create PDFs, as well as create SEO-optimized websites. You can also print them—so there is no excuse to not pull the trigger on ordering a printer when you start the campaign.
