When it comes to image organization, many people shy away from this task because they're not sure where to start. The results of this task make the mindless work more enjoyable as you organize images in the proper categories. Whenever you organize a photo folder, you get better photos as a result. The image panel is where fixing things can be done. If you're having a problem with your image, like an exposure problem, the image panel has a ton of useful tools within it. If you can see the image you want to fix, it can be changed on the fly. Since changes can be made to a selection, objects, images, and the whole graphic in general, you should probably look at it before you attempt to make it autofix with the in-place editor. If you're a beginner or don't have a ton of experience, automatic tools are great because they handle the bulk of the work for you. While the automatic tools need to expose you to how to interpret the information they give you to make decisions, they can be a great way to get started. The best way to learn is to practice – you'll learn from the mistakes you make. It makes correcting mistakes a whole lot easier as you don't have to go back and change things if the tool didn't properly interpret the data. For everyone, there is always a learning curve, but automatic tools have a long, wide, flat part. While older versions of Elements allowed you to use Adobe Photoshop Lightroom style filters with your photos, newer ones prefer to push their own proprietary methods. Elements' filters are very rough, have odd edges (they're not necessarily sharp), and aren't true to the colors on your monitor at all. Adobe hasn't done anything to make it better. They've also made some very stupid mistakes in their filters, most notable being the fact that you can't scale them (among other things). However, there has been talk of a major upgrade to that process, which should jumpstart the development process and make it easier for others to adapt it.
