Working in Photoshop always meant juggling lots of controls and tools. Photoshop 6 introduced this tool called Vanishing Point, which lets you draw a circular guide and quickly snaps to it. You can select and move that interior line (connected to the circle border) around the screen. Then, you can mask out your frame like you would a regular layer inside of Photoshop. Once you're through masking, you know where your frame is and you have the ability to select it and its area attributes. In other words, you have total control over your frame. Its line of demarkation, along with the area that is or is not highlighted, becomes a layer inside of Photoshop. The original idea of content-based despeckling in Photoshop was pretty awesome. It was great to be able to select areas where the colors or gradations looked dull and despeckle them from the rest of the image. However, it was pretty limited to just one type of image. The Content Aware Fill tool in Photoshop CS6 lets you fill the dark areas of your image with content from other photos. It applies one tone across the despeckled areas to simulate a neutral gray in a complex image. It uses 33 levels of gray to determine this, but you can control how each one affects the overall tone using available sliders and stepping ranges. Awesome job with this review and the art, Leandro. Thanks for taking the time to do it. Admittedly, I have been using Photoshop CC for about three years now and am still not 100% happy with it. Regardless of the performance issues, I still find it very easy to use and adapt to, but I am starting to become more and more frustrated with its inherent lack of functionality. Especially since I'm also in the same boat as you in that I like making art, but have no desire to draw as much as I like editing photos.
