To get a sense of how effective the iPad Pro's new SmartGlass experience was, we engaged in a bit of digital sleuthing. We started with an iPad Pro and iPad Pro (12.9-inch) each paired with a Magic Keyboard. We then tracked down and tested a handful of apps that use the SmartGlass experience on iOS. We found that it works best in apps where the user is collaborating with editors. That collaboration includes designing, sharing, providing feedback, and just viewing the latest changes made to the collaborative file. While it's not a replacement for the desktop for certain tasks, it can fill the gaps, and it can start a new job. Editors can pull up their design or storyboard on the iPad, work from there, and then transfer their work to the desktop with just a few taps. Editors can ask questions, make changes, and provide feedback. And when the editors provide their feedback, it shows on the iPad, so the person commenting can see what they missed. It is a feature that is greatly welcomed by writers, artists, researchers, and visual content producers of any kind. While it didn't take the place of the desktop, it creates opportunities that the desktop never did, and its ability to complement the desktop is a boon to almost any creative. If you're using the Adobe Creative Cloud applications on iOS, the latest updates bring new design tools, files and features to the iPad Pro-compatible apps. The update brings Photoshop to iPad Pro (12-inch) and iPhone SE owners, Standard, Standard with SVG, and Standard with DNG support. In addition, you can now export DNG files from Photoshop CC.
